Lockbit 3.0 Victim Case: Entrust

With the recent Lockbit Ransomware group targeted Entrust company, we thought it was time to take a closer look at what they do.

The first thing you should know about this business is that its foundation lies in security--which makes sense considering their name! They strive for excellence and offer many different types of services including anti-virus protection as well encryption software development so even if someone were able bypass other parts (like firewalls) there'd still be something stopping him or her from getting inside data storage systems with these tools installed

HIVE Ransom Groups

Hive ransom groups are also known by the names of 'bugs' or 'glitch couples'. These groups are known to be experts in extorting funds by making threats to shut down systems unless a ransom is paid.

Hive ransom groups are becoming increasingly brazen in their demands for money, as evidenced by the recent Wootton Academy Trust attack.

These groups are not to be underestimated; they have a wide reach and are willing to exploit any vulnerabilities they find.

Companies need to be vigilant in protecting themselves against these types of attacks, which can have devastating consequences.

B R A N D E F E N S E

The CL0P ransomware group has claimed an attack on UK-based utility supplier South Staffs Water after misattributing the attack to a different company.

South Staffs Water confirmed the attack on Monday, saying it was “experiencing disruption to [its] corporate IT network”, but did not state the attack was ransomware in nature.

CL0P published a trove of stolen documents on its leak blog on Monday, including passport scans, spreadsheets, drivers' licences, screenshots of wastewater treatment software user interfaces, and more.

It also claimed to have access to more than 5TB worth of data belonging to the hacked company which it falsely believed to be Thames Water, despite many of the published documents clearly showing South Staffs Water as the victim.
